Marcius Philippus, the censor, erected one regulated for Roman use. To some people, however, the new method of telling time was not entirely desirable. Plautus puts in the mouth of one of his characters an amusing diatribe against the recent innovation, beginning: May the gods destroy the man who first discovered hours, and even more, the man who first set up a sun-dial here and divided the day into little bits of pieces for poor me. In 159 B. C. Scipio Nasica introduced the first water-clock.¹ The study of astronomy had progressed so that many Romans were able to comprehend the scientific explanation of natural phenomena. In 168 B. C, before the battle of Pydna, when an eclipse of the moon terrified the soldiers, C. Sulpicius Gallus, the military tribune of Aemilius Paulus, the next day explained the occurrence to them, giving them a brief description of the planetary system. According to Livy he not only explained the phenomenon but also announced the hour beforehand.² While it is improbable that he would be able to make such definite calculations, still it is important that a Roman officer of the time could make such an explanation.
